"While not limited to student efforts, the movement to end American involvement in Vietnam was begun on college and university campuses in this country. It was appropriate then, that on 15 October, 1969, with the vast majority of the American people now repeat now opposing a United States role in the Vietnam war, that massive, peaceful demonstrations - the largest in our history - were held at virtually every college and university in the United States. The large turnout of Americans of all ages and the sombre, peaceful repeat peaceful character of the protest served to persuade numbers of "uncommitted" repeat "uncommitted" Americans that the cause of peace is in fact just repeat just.

"The public response of US Government officials to the demonstrations has been guarded, but there are hints that some movement toward a ceasefire and/or withdrawal may be eminent. Further notice to this effect may be served in President Nixon's speech on the night of 3 November.

"It is now apparent that continuing non-violent protest meetings and marches will be necessary to further peacefully persuade our Government to adopt a policy of immediate disengagement in Vietnam. To that end, I have personally endorsed the Mobilization Day protest marches scheduled on 15 November 1969, for Washington, D.C. and San Francisco, California.

"I would earnestly urge, as the president of the largest national union of students in the United States, that our constituent student and youth groups, together with all other persons of good will, consider participation in similar discussions and other activities that will enable them to peacefully manifest their own concern with US and Allied intervention in Vietnam. I urge that such manifestations be peaceful, democratically organized and open to friend and foe alike. It is in this manner, I believe, that human understanding can best be realized, and an impact on the larger, more passive segments of our respective societies then be achieved.

"Please let me know as soon as possible your feeling and tentatively your plan in this regard.
